Philosophers are concerned with what is important in life, so two things are surprising about what they have said about humor. The first is how little they have said. From ancient times to the 20 th century, the most that any notable philosopher wrote about laughter or humor was an essay, and only a few lesser-known thinkers such as Frances Hutcheson and James Beattie wrote that much. The word ...

In particular, 18 th Century sentimentalist philosophers often (e.g., Shaftesbury (1711) and Hume (1738-1740)) identified conscience with a moral "sentiment" or moral "sense". According to Hume's psychological theory, for instance, "reason is wholly inactive and can never be the source of so active a principle as conscience, or a sense of morals" (Hume 1738-1740: book 3, part ...
