I've heard an argument that writing stories with this template actually suppresses the information content of the story because there is so much boilerplate in the text. If you find that true, then correct it in how you present the story. I've seen backlogs in Word that present the boilerplate in grayed text with the unique parts in black. I've created product backlogs in Excel that use column ...

For example, you can photograph a landscape of a random mountain that looks similar to the 1000s of different mountains. Or you capture a leg of a person in a photograph, and it's almost impossible to tell who it is. As long as you can prove that your subject is unidentifiable beyond a reasonable doubt, then a photo release form isn't required. How do you position a standard photography ...
